It has been 30 years since Belarus, Moldova, Ukraine, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia - the six European countries of the former Soviet Union - have become independent, at least formally. But the full exercise of their sovereignty is still undermined by Moscow's actions. The trouble is that these states also make up the strip of European territory considered by Russia as its lifeline, its sphere of "vital interest"; a grey zone where Kremlin's narrative blurs the line between foreign and domestic policy.

As for the European Union, due to different political and economic interests, it has too often allowed its policy towards its post-Soviet European neighbours to be guided by the concern of "do not upset Russia". But experience shows that this caution approach has led to an impasse in the relations between the EU and Russia.

To fully grasp what Kremlin policy means and what is at stake for Europe as a whole, it is important to acknowledge that Western or Russian perceptions and approaches are not enough: we need the eyes and the experience of these neighbours.
